Captain Holmes, Captain McRae, and others proceeded to the spot, and let down a well rope of sufficient length to reach the soldier, and capable of sustaining him for a time. Both Captain McRae and Captain Holmes volunteered to go down, but as the former was a light weight it was decided that he should make the trial, Captain Holmes demurring, as he wished to undertake the risk himself. The rope being very weak, it could not possibly have borne Captain Holmes's great weight. Captain M-Rae was accordingly sent down by means of a four-strand tent rope, and on reaching the water found the soldier practically insensible; he therefore decided to go up with him. Captain Holmes was at the head of the rope, and his strength enabled him to lift both completely. After hauling up about 10 or 15 feet, the rope broke, precipitating Captain McRae and his charge to the bottom of the well. A second attempt was made, and both were brought to the surface. The depth of the well was 83 feet, of which 12 feet was water. It was quite dark at the time. With reference to this case, the following divisional order by the Duke of Connaught was issued to the troops in his command:—"His Royal Highness the Major General commanding, having been made acquainted with the circumstances connected with the rescue from drowning in a well at Rawul Pindee of Trumpeter S. <sup>1</sup> General Laye served with the 53th Regiment as Captain during the New Zealand war of 1845-47, and was actively engaged in the assault and capture of Kawiti's Pah on the 11th January 1846 (mentioned in orders); was also engaged in several minor affairs in the Southern Province. Commanded the Troops at Wanganni, and was instrumental in the capture of five Natives who had barbarously murdered and mutilated the family of a settler. The Chiefs of the District, who were nearly related to the culprits, assembled a war party of 700 men for their rescue, while the British force consisted of only 170 men, notwithstanding which Captain Laye ordered a Court Martial, composed of subalterns, for the trial of the murderers, and on their conviction had four of them hanged as soon as possible. The execution was followed by an attack upon the settlement by the war party, and which was repulsed with great loss. Governor Sir George Grey, in two despatches to Earl Grey, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, reported,—“the firmness and decision with which Captain Laye acted had saved the country from serious and protracted rebellion.” He received the special approbation of Her Majesty through Earl Grey in the following terms,—“I have it especially in command to assure you of the sense which Her Majesty entertains of the firmness with which Captain Laye acted upon the occasion of the attack of the Natives on the town of Wanganni, and of the gallant conduct of himself and the detachment under his orders on that occasion.” He was mentioned in the Government Gazette and despatches, received the Brevet of Major, and Medal.
